NOTE

Ancient glass is the frailest yet one of the most enduring memorials of past civilization. It endears itself to collectors by the variety and beauty of its form and the brilliancy of its iridescence. It resembles the flashing of gold and silver, the opalescence of rare gems, and the colors of the rainbow. This is due to the long exposure to natural chemical agents while in the ground and cannot be imitated successfully; so in the splendid lustre that adorns these frail remains of the past, the accumulated crust removed from their surface and the highly impregnated odor of the earth that has surrounded them for ages is the conclusive evidence of their remote antiquity.

Museums as well as private collectors here and in Europe vie with each other in obtaining the choice specimens of ancient glass. The British Museum owns the earliest dated specimen of glass. It is an Egyptian amulet, 3064 years B.C. Our Metropolitan Museum of Art has the largest collection of ancient glass in this country.

The Romans were great lovers of beautiful glass. Nero paid 6,000 sesterces for two small cups of white glass with handles. He also paid the equivalent of $250,000 for one Murrhina bowl. The Arabs were also lovers of glass. Al-Hariri, an early Arabic writer, describes an iridescent glass vase shown to him as follows: "He set before us whatever is sweet in the mouth or fair to the eye, and after this he brought forth a vase which was as though it had been congealed of air, or condensed of sun-beam notes, or moulded of the light of the open plain, or peeled from the white pearl."

The present collection is the smallest but the finest of the kind I have ever offered for sale by auction. I have no other collection, and do not expect to receive one until after the war in Europe. This collection includes rare specimens of Egyptian, Phoenician, Hebrew, Greek, Roman and Arabic glass, dating from 1500 years B.C. to 400 A.D. Many specimens could not be duplicated anywhere at any price. Most of the pieces come from my own finds in Syria, and only a few of them have been obtained by purchase. I guarantee them all to be genuine Antiques and as described in the catalogue. Only the Tanagra figures are sold without guarantee. They are interesting, not only in that they afford information as to the Greek life in the Third and Fourth Centuries B.C., but because of their artistic value as works of art.

Among the potteries are several very interesting pieces. Number 291 is an exceptionally choice specimen. The necklaces are all very interesting and beautiful, and these are especially suitable for holiday gifts.

Any information desired about articles in the Collection will be given cheerfully.
